EGERSDÖRFER, Ing. Fritz. [from ADI(K) summaries (10.45): The proprietor of an engineering bureau in Friedenau. He claims never to have worked for any Ministry but to have had all his patents either confiscated or commandeered by the RLM. Details of his most important patents are as follows: (a) Double gear fuel pump (Doppelzahnrad Förderpumpe), this pump was used on all BMW engines of recent design (all BMW 805s). 300,000 had been built under licence by Ehrich u. Gratz, Ilsestrasse 97, Berlin; (b) Double gear fuel injection pumpe (Doppelzahnrad Einspritzpumpe). This pump was to be used both on regular aero-engines and also on jet units. It was completed but not yet in production. The RLM had taken the patents; (c) Pneumatic starter for aircraft engines (Druckluftstarter). 175 of these had been built under licence by Sumvergasser K.G., Michael Kirchstrasse, Berlin; (d) High pressure pumps for jet units, These were of two types: double and single geared. They were to be built by Gebrüder Köppe A.G. Schonaus Allee 132, Berlin; (e) Adjustable automatic [pump for hydraulic landing gear. This pump had been completed but was not in production although the RLM had the patents; (f) A patented idea for gradual increase in the aceleration of rocket projectiles based on the incorporation of chamber containing water, which, on being heated, forced fuel into the combustion chamber at a gradually increasing rate. The RLM had taken the patent; (g) Another patented idea for firing shells by starting combustion in the front of the powder chamber rather than in the rear, thus preventing the expulsion of unburned powder. It was stated that Egersdorfer gear pumps had many applications other than aero engines. One, designed for the naptha industry, was designed for the pumping of viscous fluids. A pile of papers and plans concerning most of the above mentioned patents has been passed to ADI(K).]

EVERLING, Dr. (habil.)Emil. [from ADI(K) summaries (10.45): - From 1914 - 1932 held the post of Chief Scientist at the recently opened D.V.L. at Berlin-Adlershof. He subsequently became Professor at the Berlin Technische Hochschule and there produced the well known "Everling Quantities". In 1940 he was appointed head of the newly formed Institut für Luftfahrtmesstechnik. Everling had certain original ideas on making aircraft instruments function according to the laws of nature, so that the pilots reaction to reading the dials is quicker and more automatic. Thus, he claims, that the climb indicator, which ascends when the aircraft is losing height, is a better instrument than the normal altimeter, the needle of which, after the aircraft has passed a certain height, descends on the opposite side of the dial. Another of Everling's ideas is to achieve a truly "blind" system of flying in this the artificial horizon works through the pilot's seat, pressure plates rising on one side or the other according to which wing drops. Other parts of the body are used for acceleration, climb, turn, etc. All these experiments Everling claims to have carried out in a Link-trainer at the Institut für Luftfahrtmesstechnik and the pilots responses were said to have been quicker, more accurate and more automatic.]

KNAPP, Horst Albrecht. [from ADI(K) summaries (10.45): - Prior to the war, this man worked with Osram and Telefunken. Throughout the period of hostilities Knapp served with the GAF signals. Latterly, he was attached to I. Flak Division, Berlin and invented and put into operation a dial system whereby Flak Radar operators, hearing their on battery open fire, dialled two numbers, representing the height at which the battery was engaging, which were then immediately transmitted to the Commanding General's Watch Room where they were illuminated as numbers on a glass screen. In this way, the Commanding General could see at a glance which batteries were engaging the enemy and the height at which they were shooting. This system had advantages in speed and manpower over the manual system and was so successful in operation that it was proposed to embody the use of a four figure number in order to transmit additional data.]

OLSCHEWSKI, Dipl.Ing. ?. [from ADI(K) summaries (10.45): During the first 4 years of the war he was engaged on ionospheric research for the Luftwaffe in Berlin, and subsequently at evacuation sites in Southern Germany. A paper on his work in this field had been passed to ADI(K). Latterly concerned with the development of the "V-Steuerkopf" - an automatic device for use in jet fighters. Its use for V-weapons was also projected. The apparatus, said to have a range of 50 km consisted of a search receiver operating on 3-5 cm. which swept through the frequency band used by H2S and H2X and automatically tuned itself to any loud signal picked up. On receipt of the signal (say from a master bomber) the receiver commenced to operate an auto-pilot by which the aircraft was then flown to home in on the master bomber. This was done by means of separate VHF R/T equipment. When range was closed to 50/70 meters canon fire opened up automatically. The living pilot then switched off the "V-Steuerkopf" and resumed control in order to take evasive action. A modification said to be under way was the incorporation of a radio proximity fuse fitted to some form of rocket missile which would direct itself in to the vicinity of the master bomber or bomber stream and there explode. Development of the apparatus was started in mid-1943 and reached full production in January 1945. Work also commenced in April at Schmargendorff and at the Blaupunktwerke, but owing to the disruption of the Berlin radio industry only 20 sets were produced up to the time of the capitulation. The fate of these sets is unknown but is believed that they may have fallen into Russian hands.]

REDER, Dipl.Ing. Otto. [from ADI(K) summaries (10.45): - 45 years of age . After taking an engineering (physics) degree in 1926, he joined the Heinkel Company at Warnemünde, specializing on metal construction principles and later the Nurflügel autogyro. In 1932 he went to England as personal assistant to de al Cierva but in 1938 authority to renew his working permit was refused and he had to return to Germany. Then joined Flettner in the capacity of liason official between the design staff and the test pilots and was one of those responsible for the development of the Fl 265 and Fl 282. In addition he developed the autogyro principle for marine craft and drew up plans for a six ton speed boat which had two 1.30 metre diameter rotors beneath the hull to lift the boat on to the surface of the water. Tests on this were carried out in the Hamburg high speed tank an a film of the test believed to have been available. Similarly, the same idea was also used in conjunction with midget u-boats, the rotors submerging the vessel and re-surfacing without the necessity for using diving tanks. In Jan. 1942, with the cessation of autogyro development in Germany, he joined Dr.Kramer of the Ruhrstahl A.G. as Versuchsleiter, working on the X-4, etc.]

STEIN, Dipl. Ing. Wolfgang. [from ADI(K) summaries (10.45): Pre-war Stein had considerable experience with various motor firms and since 1937 had been Leiter der Entwicklungskonstruktion Office of Junkers, Dessau. Up until the end of 1941 he was concerned with the construction of prototypes of the Jumo 210, 211, and 213 engines. In September 1941 he took charge of the Strahltriebwerk, where he was concerned solely with the physical construction of new projects. He was supplied with all the theoretical data but was also told to suggest a few possible improvements, although this was not in his special responsibility. He was concerned with the prototype 004B until its approval but when this went to series production his interest ceased, except on occasion when it was required to simplify production by reducing the amount of close observation of the workers. Thereafter his attention was turned to the development of the 012 and during the last nine months of the war period he was, in collaboration with Heinz Möllmann, the aerodynamics expert, employed solely on the development of the 012 A.]

TILING, R. [from ADI(K) summaries (10.45): no known title/rank - On the death of his brother, Reinhold, the pioneer of postal rockets, Tiling took over all his researches. After a four year study of fuels, the Heereswaffenamt became interested in his work and in 1940 he received an appointment on their staff to design offensive rockets. In 1941 Tiling joined "C.E. 3" of the RLM, a department which subsequently became E.3 of Chef TLR, on powder rockets, used for auxiliary take-off. In this connection he worked with Rheinmetall Schmidding Westphalische Sprengstoff A.G. and Dynamit A.G., advising their design, particularly the design of combustion chambers, nozzles, powder bodies and thrust calculations. Amongst other take-off rockets, he was directly concerned with the following:

(a) For Reinmetall - 109/505/A.1 - This had a 500 Kg thrust over a period of six seconds and had a nozzle which was adjustable according to the air temperature. It was designed for the Me 262;
109/515/A.1 - This was similar to the above but had a thrust of 1,000 Kg. for six seconds. It was designed for Me 262 and the Hs 292.]
